

When it gets it wrong.

A number that does not exist. A policy that was never written. Delivered in the same confident voice it uses when it is right.

THE SHIFT

That is why people try this twice and quit. But most of the time it was not lying, it was guessing, because you gave it nothing to work from. Give it your material, and tell it to use your material.

Check the facts

Anything that is going in front of somebody else, verify before it goes.

A number, a date, a name, or a citation.

Make it show its work

Force it to break down the reasoning and the weak spot usually falls out on its own.

Walk me through how you got that. What are you assuming here?

Correct it out loud

When something does not match what you know, say so. The rest of the conversation gets sharper.

That is not our process. Ours works like this. Try again.

TWO THINGS TO KNOW

It never hedges

A person would say I think, or I am not sure. It will not. So the confidence in the answer tells you nothing about whether it is right. You have to be the one who is unsure.

Loading is not using

A workspace full of your real material will still answer from its own training unless you say: use the documents I gave you, and do not fall back on general knowledge.

Why you are the one checking

Not because the technology is bad. Because you are the one who knows. It does not know your building, your patients, your payers, or what happened last spring. That is not a gap in the tool. That is your value.

Where to find it. The line that tells it to use your documents goes in the instructions of your Gem, Project, Custom GPT, or Copilot agent.

YOUR CHALLENGE THIS WEEK

Go back to something it gave you this week. Read it again slowly and find the one thing that does not quite sit right. Then tell it exactly what is wrong.

Watch how fast it corrects when you give it something real.

Before you send anything, read it. You are the pilot. AI is the co-pilot. Every decision still goes through you.

That is the series. You have the recipe, you know where the lines are, and you have pointed it at the work you actually do.
